MARKET COMMENTARY

The Nasdaq 100 Index declined in November, lagging behind the S&P 500's slight gain, amid heightened volatility and concerns over AI-related company valuations. Technology stocks, including Nvidia, Microsoft, and AMD, experienced declines of over 10%, despite Nvidia's strong earnings report. Healthcare was the top-performing sector, led by biotech companies, although it was a relative detractor compared to the broader index. Investors are closely watching upcoming Federal Reserve decisions, with market expectations fluctuating on potential rate cuts amid mixed economic signals such as rising unemployment and inflation data. Overall, the index's performance underscores sector-specific influences and macroeconomic uncertainties, highlighting the need for careful analysis in current market conditions.
