MARKET COMMENTARY

The Philippine stock market ended a four-month decline with the PSEi rising 1.56% in November, driven by local investor support amid persistent foreign outflows and soft macroeconomic data. Sector performance was mixed, with telecoms and property leading gains on regulatory clarity and rate cut expectations, while consumer staples outperformed discretionary sectors. Despite political risks and a slowdown in GDP growth, macroeconomic indicators such as easing inflation, improving remittances, and rising reserves support a cautiously optimistic outlook. A recovery in government's fiscal spending, potential rate cuts to cushion economic growth, and the reaffirmation of the country's BBB+ sovereign rating are positive signs that may spur investor confidence in the Philippines. Overall, valuations are attractive, but market sentiment remains fragile, hinging on political stability, currency stability, and signs of economic acceleration to restore investor trust.
