MARKET COMMENTARY

Investors expected the U.S. central bank to ease its monetary policy in 2024, which boosted global markets significantly in December. This added to the positive returns that global stocks, represented by the MSCI World Index, had achieved for most of 2023. The index rose +4.9% in December. The equity market also showed more diversity in its performance, as U.S. small-caps, European and Japanese stocks joined the rally that had been led by a few large U.S. Technology and Consumer Discretionary companies. Bonds also benefitted from the lower interest rate outlook, as the Bloomberg U.S. Aggregate Bond Index posted its best two-month return in decades, with +8.5%. International and emerging market bonds were among the top performers in December, as they gained from a weaker U.S. dollar and favourable inflation data. Long-term U.S. government bonds also did very well, both in absolute and relative terms. U.S. investment grade and high yield bonds saw strong price increases in December, as credit was supported by moderate inflation data and solid U.S. economic data, such as the better-than-expected U.S. November retail sales. Peso appreciated against the dollar in December to 55.37 from previous month's 55.49, reducing the overall return of the fund.
